

Naomi Dillon is the managing editor of the Center for Public Education, the research arm of the National School Boards Association. Launched in 2006, CPE provides practical information and analysis about the successes and challenges facing public schools. As managing editor, Dillon oversees the editorial and production process for all of CPE's research projects and manages the center's web and social media presence.

Previously, Dillon worked in NSBA's publication department as a senior editor on the award-winning American School Board Journal and as a reporter at various daily newspapers, including the Seattle Times and Chicago Tribune. She has a journalism degree from Western Washington University and an M.S. in management and public relations from the University of Maryland University College.