

Becky St. Andrie is the manager of the Center for Public Education, an initiative of the National School Boards Association. Launched in 2006, NSBA's Center provides practical information and analysis about the successes and challenges facing public schools in the U.S. As manager, she works with authors to edit material for the site and oversees the publication process. She also handles technical improvements to the site.

Before joining the Center for Public Education in 2008, St. Andrie spent 6 years as an editor at the National Association of Elementary School Principals and two years as managing editor at the American Orthotic and Prosthetic Association. She began her career as an editorial intern with Highlights for Children. St. Andrie earned a bachelor's degree in English from Virginia Tech and a master's degree in English from Penn State.
